

Green Workplace takes the guesswork out of going green

Submitted by christys on Tue, 07/22/2008 - 06:57.

When I sat down with Nicholas Lamm, co-founder of the Vancouver-based consulting firm Green Workplace, there was one question I was just itching to ask. With the growing number of free resources available to the business community to eco-fy their operations, how does a private consulting firm like Green Workplace survive? His answer is simple. “We do it all, and we make it really easy.”

Nicholas explains that there are a number of areas in which an organization can make changes to improve their ecological footprint; paper, waste, energy, carbon, water, and fuel management being the big six. Most municipal, provincial and privately funded programs focus on one of these areas, and will provide businesses with a free walk-

business practices Consulting green solutions sustainable practices work workplace

login or register to post comments